That sounds like a pretty cool feature, even if I'm not totally sure why and how it works or if it's worth using. What does it actually do for you? There's three gameplay effects on offer, all relating to that motion-based technology. The first is "Total Control," which allows players to feel themselves control the ball better and play more with their feet. The second effect is "Focus," which increases player readiness when receiving a pass or moving the ball. And the third is "Fluidity," which increases the feeling of control in general, both passing and dribbling. You can see an example of 'Total Control' in the video below. HyperMotion is not a perfect system for FIFA—that's obvious from the footage above. But it is a step forward, and one I'd be happy to use instead of the standard, sometimes unattainable 'feel.' The differences are subtle at first, but very quickly become more noticeable. The dynamic movement of the ball is, for the first time, more directly linked to the player's movements than with the stick. That's not a problem for me, and hopefully, it won't for you either. I'm not sure what it's like to use outside of a match situation, but the goals in this training mode were easily identifiable even to someone without access to proper motion capture software. One of the main annoyances was the poor accuracy of the pass option. It could frequently ping the ball off target, even after working in perfect form. It was impossible to hit a pass at anything like real-world precision. But the ball looked great, and you can clearly see the effect of HyperMotion in the video below. This is the handball sequence in Fifa 22 Cracked Version, played with Total Control enabled. It's possible to use Total Control outside of FIFA, however, because it isn't tied to any particular control scheme. The ball now feels more responsive to speed changes, and I notice that when going into a dribble or pass, it feels like it's following me in mid-air, rather than just being controlled by the stick. The biggest change is you actually want to control the ball more. You've spent years subconsciously thinking, "I have to power it in here because I know how to do that," or "I need to move in here because there's less resistance
