One of the biggest impacts of all happened some 4 billion years ago and created the Moon. The Moon formed when a Mars-sized object called Theia impacted Earth. The impact set in motion an early version of the moon-forming process called 'splitting' that would allow Earth to form its own satellite. The impact that formed Theia would have left a rocky debris disk in orbit around Theia. The debris disk would have built up to what is now known as the moon-sized moon-forming object, which would eventually create the moon that we know and love today. The place where this impact occurred would lie right in the middle of the debris disk. However, the impact would have caused a high enough velocity to eject debris into orbit around Earth. These would become the moon-forming planetesimals. Eventually, the second and third planets from the sun, Mars and Jupiter, would build up the rest of the debris disk, giving us the moon. In April 2009, NASA launched the Lunar Reconnaissance Orbiter (LRO), a spacecraft that would map the Moon for the next two years. One of its discoveries is a crater known as the Taurus-Littrow. It's a special place, because it's the right age to see how the Moon formed in its current state. The debris disk would have been present in orbit for about a billion years and was very active, creating and destroying a lot of these small rocky bodies. The orbits of these would gradually become more stable as they became more and more heavily bombarded by these smaller rocks. Eventually, some
